In a 'Game Of Thrones' world, a 'Thrones' bombshell The show has said goodbye to every major character except one. That's true, unless you're talking about the Game of Thrones Internet. Where hundreds of fan videos are uploaded every week, the fans are casting a wide net for their favorites to watch die. "I'm so happy that everyone in this world is paying attention to my life," says Sheyn, a fan from Lawrence, Kansas. His latest favorite is "Jaime + Cersei = Jane of the Woods." Jaime is Jaime Lannister, the reformed madman, and Cersei is Cersei Lannister, the power hungry queen. But instead of being burned at the stake in the show, they ended up dead in a massive explosion. "This is my favorite way to end the series," Sheyn says. Sheyn learned of the deaths from a private Facebook group. That's where he heard that the official "Game of Thrones" hashtags were being used to discuss the show. "You have to have a certain set of knowledge of the series to recognize that," he says. "There is a generation of people who aren't that excited by the show, but when you do stumble on a meme, they know who they are." Now, a few weeks after he first saw the meme, Sheyn has one goal in mind: "I need to see that in canon." Related Content What's crazy is that half of the fans at these Youtubers' forums are actually fans of the Game of Thrones book series. That's another thing you have to know about the show. Many of its stories, like this one, come from George R.R. Martin's books. In fact, Daenerys, the Mother of Dragons, is a major character in Martin's "A Song of Ice and Fire" series. And she's always dying, usually by beheading. But the Internet? This chatroom is dominated by George R.R. Martin fans who describe the show as "a very expensive piece of crap." "Cersei's personality is never represented," says Kiranth, a fan from India. "She's

The typical Iron Man costume that Tony Stark donned during the climax of The Avengers (Photo by Alexander Utan/Lionsgate) Take a deep breath. It's time to brace yourself. May the force be with you, because it's about to get hot under the collar. Today's trailers for the highly anticipated summer blockbuster, The Avengers: Age of Ultron, have got fans all worked up, and not just because of the Avengers' muscular physiques, witless banter and painfully awkward death scenes. The latest trailers, released by Disney/Marvel Studios, contain a lengthy scene that is reportedly being cut from the final film, in which Tony Stark (Robert Downey Jr.) is made to wear an all-in-one workout suit, complete with his trademark Iron Man logo on his chest. Do you think the suit looks cool? Cooler than the current Iron Man armor, you mean? I do. But we're talking about comics here, so we know that this new suit has got some serious power. "I have been waiting my whole life to do this!" Stark bellows during the trailer, before launching into the most brutal workout you've ever seen, during which he proves that the suit is hard to beat, even for Iron Man. It features a combination of targeting and targeting-plus-precision programs, along with an upgraded flight mode, a "Variable Grip" that increases resistance in your biceps and thighs, and "Combat Capabilities" that allow for strength training in a pseudo-gym setting. Some fans have been complaining about the amount of time that's spent on the suit. It's undoubtedly an integral part of the film, and Marvel's hype machine is obviously more interested in promoting this than the film itself, but the repetitive nature of the workout sequence has got some people concerned. But there's a simple fix for that, too. Another scene could be added. The face of the Iron Man helmet. (Photo by Kevin Winter/Getty Images) Within the comics, there's a long-standing tradition of having fans decide which suit of armor is the "best." In the first Iron Man, for example, people voted to have Stark get the Mark 1 "First" Iron Man suit, while in the follow-up, Iron Man 2, they voted to get the Mark 2 "Second." In the third film, Iron Man 3, fans were asked to choose between the Mark 16 "Minor" and Mark 32 "Major
