suggests that the brightness of galaxies at the center of this cluster differs from those at the outskirts. This observation indicates that the distributions of galaxies have uneven.

Light bends towards the center of a massive galaxy cluster as it propagates through intergalactic space. Astronomers studied this effect on a massive galaxy cluster known as the Coma Cluster, which is as massive as a cluster of galaxies like the Milky Way.

From the way that light bends in this galaxy cluster, astronomers can estimate the distribution of matter within this galaxy cluster. Researchers used the Hubble Space Telescope to measure the distribution of galaxies within the Coma Cluster. The results indicated that the galaxy cluster has an uneven distribution
