A: My guess would be yes, but I can't answer for sure I'm also interested to know if it's licensed to you, but as far as I know Microsoft does not allow this licensing to be shared. This is to help them track how many installs they get. However, having said that, Microsoft could be lying about the fact it has 50 installs, because they could've paid more than 1 person to download their product. This may be done so that the person doesn't get a refund. Q: How to get name of a window? Possible Duplicate: What methods are available for identifying a window/app window? I'm trying to create a simple application. To maximize, minimize, and close the app window. Is there any way to get the name of the window that the user clicked on (like about:blank,etc)? I want to write a simple "Click Me" button that will maximize the window. A: There are only few ways to find out. Get the window from Application.Current.Windows; foreach (Window window in Application.Current.Windows) { if (window.WindowState == WindowState.Minimized) { // Maximize the window } } Or to find out via Window.GetType().Name and Name: Window window = Window.GetType().GetField("Name", BindingFlags.NonPublic | BindingFlags.Instance).GetValue(null); if (window != null) MessageBox.Show(window.Name); For both methods however, you have to run your application as administrator. A: There is no direct method that can give you this information. However, you can get a reference to the current active window via Window.Current. var window = Window.Current; if (window != null) { if (window.WindowState == WindowState.Minimized) { var activeWindowTitle = window.Current.Title; // Do something with that title... } } FROM ubuntu:latest # Disable readline so that we can test cli-pcre without it RUN sed -i 82138339de
