book, “The Four Hour Work Week”, the first lesson he brings is how to see if you’re failing or succeeding. One of the big principles he lays out is how people who have become successful, in life and business, know how to fail.
The idea of failing is not an easy one to accept. We’re raised up on the idea that our greatest strength is finding something that works. If we fail, it's a big deal, it's a negative reflection on us and our abilities. As a result we tend to block failure or look at it in a negative manner. We can't acknowledge our shortcomings, not if we truly believe that we can make a difference in our world. So we compound our problems by not failing. The goal of failing in life and in business is not to fail, but to learn. Failing is not good, but building on your weaknesses, by failing, is.

Only then are we able to accept that our success and failures are the same. It's why when I talk to people about their plans, I ask them, "What is your plan to fail?" They will tell me that they aren't planning to fail, but that failing is built into their plans. "What is your plan to fail?"
