Field of the Invention The invention relates to a process and an apparatus for the extrusion of a plastic material, in particular a plastic material of the thermoplastic polyurethane type, in which the material is heated in a calender roll arrangement to its flow temperature and in the calender roll arrangement is extruded with at least one flexible belt of a material differing in consistency from the plastic material, which passes through the calender roll arrangement and is pressed against the calender roll arrangement by at least one support belt, the support belt being guided on a pulley in the form of a V-groove, and on which the heated plastic material is extruded in the form of strands and the strands are cooled in the form of tapes. B. Description of the Prior Art In known methods, plastic material extruded as strands in a calender roll arrangement by means of an extruder in the form of a calender roll is moved on to the support belt and is then pressed by means of support rollers of the support belt against the calender roll, where the plastic material is cooled. The cooling of the strands is generally effected in a plurality of stages, the plastic material first being cooled by the support rollers by way of the support belt and is then cooled, or at least brought to a desired temperature, by way of the support belt by way of the calender roll arrangement. It is disadvantageous that the apparatus for the cooling has a large structural volume, which is a considerable drawback particularly when the plastic material is to be extruded to form ribbons or tapes. For example, such an apparatus for cooling plastic material is disclosed in
