No sooner has news of Microsoft's global anti-spam plan (Operation Aurora) surfaced, than the Redmond software giant has announced that it has acquired email and reputation management service Teros. Terms of the acquisition were not disclosed. Teros operates a reputation and anti-spam toolkit that is used to discover and prevent identity theft and reduce the impact of spam. The toolkit collects information and data from multiple sources such as the web and other major email clients. Teros was founded in 1997 by Daniel Moeller, who currently serves as the company's general manager. In a statement, Moeller added that he was impressed by Microsoft's commitment to helping consumers avoid identity theft and reduce spam. "I am happy with the partnership I have built with Microsoft, and I can't wait to see what we do together next," he said. Microsoft's Chief of Anti-Spam Technology recently stated that anti-spam efforts would be the company's top priority. The goal is to bring that spam out into the open and to start a public debate about how to deal with the problem. We'll see how that debate goes. There is a possibility that this legislation will make things
