A new analytical method for the determination of ceftazidime in human plasma was developed. The method is based on capillary zone electrophoresis. The separation was performed in a fused silica capillary with detection at 220 nm. The method was validated by determining the linearity of the calibration curve, precision, accuracy, limit of detection and limit of quantitation and stability of the drug under different storage conditions. The lower limit of quantification of the proposed method was 25 ng/mL, and the within-day and between-day accuracy and precision were within 13.3% and 12.9%, respectively. The mean recovery of the method ranged from 90.9% to 101.6%. The method was successfully applied to the determination of ceftazidime concentrations in plasma samples obtained from patients.Health of children in Peru: an exploratory study
