Each of the miRNAs of the human genome is thought to be encoded by its own gene, and evidence has suggested that miRNAs are generally located near or within protein coding genes. Like mRNAs, miRNAs are also transcribed by RNA polymerase II. Genes encoding miRNAs have been found to be located at the ends of introns, in introns, or at the 5'ends of coding sequences, and in a few cases, within the 3'untranslated regions of protein coding genes. Almost all miRNAs are expressed at some point in the life of a cell. The expression of

: U.S.-Russia Strategic Alliance Speculates on the Russo-Chinese Treaty Map of Russo-Chinese Military Alliance Forces as well as Ties to China Main Cast Russian forces are actively building up on the border with China. At the same time, Japanese troops are reported to be setting up a military base in Russia's Far East. Washington is readying their own base to counter Russian forces. What does this mean for Russo-Chinese military-strategic cooperation, China's Belt and Road Initiative, and Japan's bid to turn Russia into its own vassal? In the war of spheres of influence that involves Russia and China, there is a warning that one or both governments might try to undermine the other by getting one of their allies to act subversively. This is a type of "devil's bargain" that plays to each government's strengths. Both Russia and China are looking for a buffer to a hypothetically aggressive United States. Only a 20-plus year-old military-strategic alliance between these adversaries, both geographically close to one another but with long historical enmity, lends them a certain degree of diplomatic independence from their respective U.S.-dominated global orders. Whether the two countries manage to strengthen the Russo-Chinese partnership, keep it at what they want it to be, or even shake it up according to plan, is still up in the air. In any case, we are a long ways from an unbreakable Russo-Chinese military strategic partnership. Russia over the last two years has rebuilt its military-strategic partnership with China with emphasis on covert measures. The underlying assumption is that the two countries want to shape a potential Russo-Chinese military alliance in advance of talks between the U.S. and China over restraining the U.S.-Chinese military relationship on submarines, space, air, and cyber. These are the talks on the "core-periphery" priority list of the U.S.-China Strategic and Economic Dialogue (S&ED) centered around the Regional Comprehensive Economic Partnership. The talks are set to start officially Aug. 30-Sept. 7 in Beijing. Last November, the U.S. started talks with China on the military issue when the Pentagon and then-Defense Secretary Ash Carter visited Beijing to discuss China's military modernization. Since then, the U.S. has tried to balance the
