I have been given a database. the database is designed to keep a set of records. it is obvious that the database was designed by somebody else because it does not follow the normal naming standards, the database is a MS SQL server 2008 database. The database is supposed to hold records that will be migrated to a new database on a different location. There is a database on the other location that will be linked to this database as a link. The database at the second location was created many years ago. i am trying to create the database from this database. i am also a backup of the original SQL Server on my laptop. i copied the files and created a new database from the original database. the database will have many tables and data. the result from the comparison shows the same number of records. The problem is that the database at the second location is restricted from viewing the structure of the new database, i cannot even do a backup on the new database to another location to make sure that the data was copied and not lost. this database is supposed to be a backup of the original database. Am i doing something wrong? is there a chance that the database i created is not the same as the original database? A: You need to perform a database compare in order to see whether the database you are creating is d0c515b9f4
