Father of Drama Queen Drama 'heartfelt' because free speech is a contentious issue AUSTIN, Texas—Travis County Sheriff Sally Hernandez is defending herself from criticism about a tweet about a local civil-rights group's planned protest against the Confederate flag. In a Facebook post, Hernandez touted the services of the Austin Police Department's Special Response Team and her county's Special Weapons and Tactics Division. "We have planned for a peaceful protest, and I am confident we will exercise our First Amendment rights without interference from anyone," the sheriff wrote. "We've been planning since this group came together and will have law enforcement personnel on site to ensure that all who want to express their First Amendment rights can do so peacefully." The sheriff's post sparked a wave of criticism on social media, including from some Texas county sheriffs. Hernandez responded to the criticism, saying her post is "heartfelt" and that she "could have used stronger words" in it. The sheriff declined to be interviewed for this story, saying she wanted to focus on her job as sheriff and the "debate" over the Confederate flag. "My comments were not meant to be disrespectful to anyone in the group," she wrote. "However, I was not pleased with the language I used to express my sincere feelings." The Houston-based group is planning to protest outside the Texas Capitol on Aug. 18 and at a newly-opened monument of the Confederate States of America, according to its Facebook page. Travis County and Austin are adjacent to each other in Texas, making the city one of the state's largest urban centers, with many social, economic and racial disparities. The Civil War in Texas was a largely anti-Union regional war, known as the "Radical War" for its violent and wide-ranging e79caf774b
