I am loading each recyclerview in an AsyncTask within the fragment (mainActivity or called activity) using a method from an interface. I am aware that an AsyncTask is an background thread. Is it possible to just use one thread, or will I need several threads, one for each tab? A: First of all you need to give priority to your main activity. if(Build.VERSION.SDK_INT >= Build.VERSION_CODES.LOLLIPOP) { getWindow().setFlags(WindowManager.LayoutParams.FLAG_DRAW_SYSTEM_BAR_BACKGROUNDS, WindowManager.LayoutParams.FLAG_DRAW_SYSTEM_BAR_ am creating a table and am dynamically creating rows from a reactive object. I'm using a column which can be hidden or visible. When its visible, a link is displayed. When you click on it, a modal window is shown. Now I want to add a button to each row. How can I trigger a click event on that button? I can figure out what row to get the button on, but I'm not sure how to trigger it. A: The thing you want to be doing in your table-data slot is generating the table row. Inside of that logic, you can use a computed property or even a watch to create an id, then pass that into a click handler on the generated element. Example of a watch approach `tr (:key="$index") .id (:id="rowId") .onclick (:event="click")` Example of a computed property approach `tr (computed: { get currentRow() { return this.$data._rows[this.$index] }, get rowId() { return this.$data._rows[this.$index].id }, click () { this.$data._rows[this.$index].onclick = true } })` So basically your click event handler would then look like this: `tr (:key="$index") .id (:id="rowId") .onclick (:event="click")` So in the click event handler you'd do something like this: `click () { if (this.$data._rows[this.$index].onclick) { this.$data._rows[this.$index].onclick(); } }` I would recommend the watch over the computed approach as this is a more
