Dear Students, Many of you already know and many don't. Let me just tell you. I have to read a lot of research papers on campus and during my own practice. This includes reviewing results of other studies that used the same methodology as mine. A methodology was typically a sample size of three to six (if it's a random sample). Some of these studies had easily between 5,000 to 30,000 or more. The meta-analyses, that took the results from multiple studies, always had sample sizes of 10 to 35,000. So I have to double the number of participants in almost every study that I read. This means that with my current reading habit, I am researching "just" 120 participants and that is why I need to finish my current paper today. If the sample sizes are the same, but the included participants between studies can be different, I am then talking about over 100,000 participants, which would make a higher quality paper. Research questions often include a comparison of control and treatment groups, and unfortunately the sample sizes in these types of studies need to be enormous to be statistically significant. Did you notice that also about the study design? The methodology and the sample size are crucially important when estimating the effect of a treatment or intervention. (I know this sounds simple but we are talking about medical research) So, what does this all mean? This means that we researchers have to start being honest with ourselves about our sample sizes. We need to use methods that limit the number of participants we ask to
