Although it lacks advanced features of a .Group therapy as a source of coping information for parents of children with critical illness. This study examined whether parents of sick children who participated in group therapy learned new coping information. Spouses and adult children of patients in the medical intensive care unit were recruited to the study. In study 1, the effect of the participation in two counseling groups, an illness-specific group and a general support group, on the parenting styles of the spouses was evaluated. The parenting style of the spouses of the group participants was more supportive than that of the spouses of the control participants. In Study 2, a single-subject experiment was performed to identify the content of the information and skills learned by the parents participating in the counseling groups. The information obtained was organized into categories for each of the subjects, and the percentage of the total time of the sessions spent on each category was calculated. The participants learned coping information regarding the illness and information related to the group, such as empathy and understanding of the illness experience. The information taught in the illness-specific group was useful for the parents as it related to their own experiences, and the information learned in the general support group was somewhat unrelated to the experience of being a parent of a critically ill child but was useful for the partners of these parents. Complex multiplex BAC genotyping assay for identifying progeny of large-scale backcrosses. To determine the performance of a commercial multiplex BAC genotyping assay used for identifying adult F1 progeny, five 10-Mb genomic segments were randomly selected from the genome sequence and used to design a highly multiplexed (16 to 29 fragments) multiplex BAC genotyping assay. Additional BACs and low-copy repeats were also used to aid in the genetic assignment of each progeny animal. The overall performance of this genotyping assay was assessed through comparison of expected and observed frequencies of informative markers in the three generations of a large-scale backcross breeding program using a representative breed (n = 1,335). The overall power of the assay was sufficient for determining the ratio of the most common genetic backgrounds in the F1 generation, for identifying sires and dams of each backcross generation, and for selecting the animals for parental line maintenance.
