Proteins are fundamental to the function of most biological processes. They perform many vital functions, from transport, to structural and functional roles, and to their diverse interactions with other molecules. Due to their role in molecular interactions and cellular processes, proteins are of major interest for medicinal chemistry. They can serve as therapeutic agents, particularly in areas such as oncology and infectious disease, or can be used in the development of rapid diagnostic tests and immunoassays. As such, the development of strategies for generating antibodies reactive with a wide variety of antigens is a major goal of this field, and a goal that is not solved by current technologies. Antibodies, a type of protein that is one of the body's primary defense systems, in many cases bind to antigens for purposes of innate or acquired immunity and may be specific for a particular antigen or directed at a specific epitope (for example, Fab fragments are b-type antibodies that generally retain specificity while lacking antigenbinding Fc domain). They are one of the most useful tools in biochemistry, molecular biology and biotechnology, with many uses including diagnostic and therapeutic
