Seventh Generation Announces New Formulation Monday, January 11, 2010 Seventh Generation has announced that all their products (flea and all-natural) will now be USDA certified organic by the end of 2010. This means that Seventh Generation has found an organic cleaning system that is effective and safe, and they still make their products in the USA. The system uses no synthetic products and cleans more than 95% of dust mites and other allergens, as well as the associated dander that causes sensitivity to many people. Seventh Generation products can now be found in many stores nationwide, and this will mean that, if you choose a Seventh Generation product, you will know that you can buy it with confidence that it is using safe and effective products that will benefit your family.

Conejo Creek (Santa Cruz County, California) Conejo Creek (formerly Bear Creek) is a tributary of Tomales Bay, in the U.S. state of California. It is part of the San Francisco Bay drainage basin and drains an area of in the northern Santa Cruz Mountains. Course Conejo Creek rises in the Santa Cruz Mountains east of Independence Lake. It flows northwest, entering the upper end of the Gap, a canyon that forms the upper end of the Conejo Valley between the San Francisco Peninsula and Santa Cruz Mountains. It then turns northeast, reenters the Santa Cruz Mountains and flows through part of Ballona Creek State Park, an area north of Marina del Rey that has been conserved as a protected wetland. It flows into Tomales Bay at the border between Del Norte County and Marin County.

History The San Francisco Bay Conservation and Development Commission has designated Conejo Creek a "wetlands of importance" on its San Francisco Bay Coastal Wetlands Ecosystem Restoration Project, due to its undeveloped wetlands and riparian habitat. See also List of rivers in California
