We talked to Giorgio Panella, Senior Producer on FIFA, and Matt Bowlby, EA Sports Global Brand Director, about the goal of improving player awareness and player movements, artificial intelligence and what we can expect from FIFA for the next few years. Nico: I know the guys at the studio in Vancouver are pretty excited to work on the ball. I guess they have actually been working on FIFA for over 10 years now. Have the guys who built the engine for FIFA 20 been working on the ball physics as well or is this something new? Giorgio Panella: Yeah, the guys in Vancouver in EA Sports Vancouver have been working on that for a while, they also worked on FIFA 19. For the ball physics side, since the "FIFA Ball Physics" is back in FIFA 21, the ball physics from FIFA 20 is what we can use. Also we are using the engine from FIFA 21. To answer your question about what is the impact on the ball physics, we improved the stabilisation, the bounciness, and also the control of the ball. We have improved player awareness and the player movement is going to be adjusted to be really intuitive and predictable. Matt Bowlby: We have a lot of people in our team working on that. If I can add, the goal is to understand the physics of the player and the ball in a completely new way. We also have a new cloud-based platform we can access that is more data-driven and accurate than the one we had in FIFA 19. While the variables are the same, the impact is really noticeable for the gameplay. Nico: I understand on the Impact Engine, there is a lot of work on the player animations themselves and there was a lot of work on the Player Impact Engine too. Could you give us a brief idea of how much work went into the player animations for Fifa 22 Cracked 2022 Latest Version? Giorgio Panella: It's hard to tell. Each year we just add the new animations to the game. It varies a lot every year. It's based on how much content the teams want. Nico: Also the player experiences feel more real now. How is that with the Player Impact Engine? It feels like everything is being improved. You mentioned it in the press conference. Also your controls are still the same. How is that coming along? Giorgio Panella: The controls are still the same. I'm
