A study was made of the energy metabolism of the placenta at two stages of labour: pre- and post-term. A total of 20 placentae were obtained from elective and emergency caesarean sections, at different gestational ages. The oxygen consumption and the concentration of lactate in the umbilical vein decreased from 36 to 32 hours (stage 1), and from 40 to 21 hours (stage 2) of labour. The concentration of glucose in the intervillous space rose from 4 to 18 hours (stage 1), and from 10 to 18 hours (stage 2). These metabolic changes are interpreted as showing a progressive utilization of lactate and glucose in the fetal environment.
