Q: Populating data from multiple web services I have a requirement where i have to use multiple web services to populate a set of records. What I am looking to do is the following: I have a MasterWebService which is called UserWebService for each record to be processed. The UserWebService for each record to be processed. The UserWebService returns a status indicating whether or not the Web Service needs to be called again and this is used to build up a set of records which are then sent back to the MasterWebService. This is where I am stuck, is it possible to load these records in the SQL Server database using a stored procedure? The issue is that the number of records that I need to load is extremely large. I am currently using Web Services to return the data and I am not too sure if there is another solution for this. A: Sounds like you could use a Business Continuity Plan, when your master web service catches the fault - your user web service is still running - you can then wait for them to fail - and then resume. see Q: Cannot create a branch with the same name as an existing branch I am trying to create a new branch from a existing branch: git checkout -b new_branch master But this gives me the following error: error: The requested name "new_branch from it. Another error would be if the branch master and you are trying to create a new branch from it. Another error would be if the branch master is already a branch, but has no head. Try to see your branch last the same name, just rename the existing branch master to new_branch or something, or delete it, and try again. Effect
