Burnout is known to impact health care professionals. It is highly associated with age, marital status, job satisfaction, and organizational factors. The aim of this study was to explore the factors associated with burnout among doctors and nurses in Turkey. The study was a cross-sectional, descriptive study. Data were collected by means of a questionnaire including demographics, job satisfaction, individual burnout, and organizational characteristics. The response rate was 78.7%. The mean age of the participants was 36.97±7.77 years, and 58.1% were women. According to the Cohen-Mansfield Agitation Inventory, the mean score was 1.83±1.14. Twenty-six percent of doctors and 50.8% of nurses were identified as having burnout. Multiple linear regression analysis showed that job satisfaction, was negatively correlated with emotional exhaustion and depersonalization, while working in a university hospital was positively correlated with emotional exhaustion, depersonalization, personal accomplishment, and job satisfaction. Emotional exhaustion was positively correlated with seniority and working in a university hospital. The only organizational factor associated with burnout was working in a university hospital. Levels of burnout were high among participants in this study. More studies are needed to explore the reasons for burnout in healthcare professionals in Turkey.
