The neuroimaging results of these studies were consistent with those studies that were supported by the animal researches on the effects of depression on the limbic system, ^\[@R11\],\[@R12\]\^ which has been widely known to be involved in the regulation of emotional functions. Studies of SCZ patients have consistently shown that the prefrontal cortex, especially the prefrontal-temporal lobe connection, is involved in the regulation of sensory perception and cognitive function in SCZ patients. ^\[@R23\]--\[@R25\]\^ In addition, the prefrontal cortex is a very important component of the prefrontal-temporal lobe connection. ^\[@R26\],\[@R27\]\^ Additionally, the prefrontal cortex and hippocampus are the earliest subcortical structures to mature in the human brain, and the prefrontal cortex is a primary site of the complex prefrontal-hippocampal modulation of activity in major psychiatric disorders. ^\[@R28\]--\[@R30\]\^ These findings indicated that the prefrontal-temporal lobe connection is involved in the pathophysiology of depression and that the prefrontal cortex might be a crucial contributor in the pathophysiology of depression. The hippocampus is a key structure involved in a wide variety of basic cognitive operations, including the formation of memories. ^\[@R31\]\^ The information passed through the hippocampus is integrated, encoded, and then transferred to other parts of the brain for utilization. ^\[@R32]\^ The hippocampus and prefrontal cortex are interconnected with each other and serve as a key neural circuit for integrating emotional and cognitive information. In addition, when information is transferred through the hippocampus, it is first integrated with other information; thus, the hippocampus plays a very important role in the modulation of emotion. ^\[@R33]\^ According to studies by Anticevic and his colleagues, ^\[@R34]\^ the volume of the hippocampus in SCZ is smaller than that in control subjects. Because the study has a smaller sample size, their results were not statistically significant and were of lower methodological quality, which makes their result less convincing. Although the results of
