Under the headline 'Down, but not out' we read that Martin Fletcher, a senior lecturer in management practice at Manchester Business School, has co-authored a study of 20 years of panel studies of corporate leadership that finds that the presence of a powerful chief executive doesn't inevitably translate into higher shareholder performance. "Despite fierce competition, few executives have completely dominated the shareholder value race, as many board members and institutional investors had hoped they would," says the report. One explanation of this finding is that not all CEOs, even those who performed well, were not actually overmatched by their boards. In other words, boards might have been led by very able heads of discipline, but not necessarily by "visionaries" on whose leadership that boards could rely. It is this point I want to pick up on here. Senior managers in organisations are often labelled as 'visionaries' or 'titans', with a claim that this somehow confers additional skills on them that ultimately benefits shareholders. Personally, I've seen too many boards and CEOs who were distinctly average – even one or two boards which might claim that as the person who had "guided the company through turbulent times". The main advantage that a visionary – or indeed a 'titan' – had was that they were an executive who was usually willing to take responsibility and make hard decisions (sometimes this might mean giving up a bonus or other compensation). The argument to investors was that a visionary CEO could put their people on to tasks which were 'corporate directions', rather than 'routine'. As a consequence, there is a risk that people in organisations who are being promoted as having charismatic 'vision' might actually be just being given the tasks that they could do, but their heads of discipline might be failing to influence them. When the self-interested self has taken over and motivation for improvement is gone, the choice that was once made is often a role that will be played because it has to be done. This phenomenon is still apparent in the management consultancy space. The accounts of some of the largest companies are extremely revealing about the problems that executives have in stating the truth about where they are getting things right and where they are failing. And this is not just because there is a problem with the incentive for self-interested self-presentation; it is also that there is a problem of the hierarchy
