Healthcare delivery is a complex and rapidly evolving process, as the interaction between the healthcare provider, service users and their families is transformed by advances in diagnostic and therapeutic technology. Cancer patients may be at the point of greatest contact with healthcare, but the transition of the patient through their disease trajectory from the time of diagnosis is poorly documented. We examined the current state of documentation of cancer patients' journey through the UK's National Health Service (NHS), using the National Cancer Registration and Analysis Service database. All cancer registries in England and Wales contribute individual patient data to the Cancer Datawarehouse, which is an accurate and timely repository of information. Our analysis used data for all patients diagnosed and treated at services from 2005 to 2009, who were reported in the database as alive at final follow-up (31 December 2009). We examined data for 43 730 patients, and collated data on where they were first registered and by whom. Approximately 68% of patients received their initial diagnosis from secondary care (oncology/haematology/general medicine), with a further 21% and 11% treated at primary and community care, respectively. Patients transferred from primary to secondary care (21%) at a median time of 113 days following diagnosis. Nearly half (47%) of those initiating their care at secondary care did not receive their final follow-up care in that setting. Documentation of their pathway through the system was poor, with

The value of teleradiology in reducing perioperative misdiagnosis of breast microcalcifications. To assess the value of remote teleradiology in reducing perioperative misdiagnosis of breast microcalcifications. Retrospective review of one radiologist's experience of remotely read calcifications. Imaging department of a tertiary referral centre. Retrospective review of images taken at outpatient clinic between 2005 and 2008 and read on-line by the radiologist at the referral centre. Of 693 cases, 21 were malignant and 5 were suspicious for malignancy (positive predictive value (PPV)=1.6%). This compares with 27 misdiagnosed cases in a 12-month period before remote reading of calcifications. In the remote reading group, 24 calcifications were malignant or suspicious, and two were fibroadenomas. In the on-line reading group, 20 calcifications were malignant or suspicious, and five were benign (PPV=0.7%). Remote teleradiology read by an experienced radiologist may reduce misdiagnosis of microcalcifications in the perioperative period and allow early management of the patient.. No scaling, sizing, shape, or text is selected by the user and changing these values does not affect the result. This filter applies to many elements of the SharePoint user experience. The work of design and development teams all over the world is focused on creating the best user experience for people inside and outside the company. The SharePoint task manager is itself an example of this. Highlight: Summary The SharePoint task manager is a powerful tool that provides instant management capabilities for team tasks. This should come as no surprise. Office 365 is Microsoft's largest cloud platform. Microsoft delivers team collaboration tools on this platform in many ways. Not everything can be delivered in the way that Office 365 does it because it is not possible on a backend infrastructure level. Office 365 provides a variety of tools that can be used to manage the tasks that your team members perform. These tools are limited to what is possible with the Office 365 platform. If you want to change the way your team collaborates, you cannot change the task manager feature. You may be wondering what the difference between a task manager and the collaboration tools that come in Office 365. The collaboration tools are more powerful and more scalable than the task manager, but they cannot be used to manage tasks. Task management is unique to Office 365, and no Office 365
