Preclinical evaluation of an anti-Ang1 antibody for vascular injury. The antagonist TSR-410 prevents vascular injury in experimental models and is currently being developed as a new therapeutic agent for the treatment of vascular injury and other thrombo-ischemic diseases. We performed a preclinical evaluation of TSR-410 in comparison with Tirofiban, a second-generation small-molecule antagonist of the transforming growth factor beta1, against thrombin-induced thrombosis and endothelial damage in ex vivo arterio-venous shunt as well as in collagen and wire-induced carotid injury in rats. We also performed a multicentric preclinical pharmacokinetic and toxicity study to evaluate the preclinical profile of TSR-410. After a single intravenous or oral administration of TSR-410, the plasma level was sustained over 14 days. In a time-course study of intravenous bolus injection, its half-life was 6.9 hr. After intravitreal administration, there was a slow absorption phase of about 1 week, where the maximum concentration of about 90 ng/mL was reached approximately 2 days after administration. TSR-410 showed a significant inhibition of both platelet deposition and coagulation activity in thrombosis models. Tirofiban did not show this effect. In the ex vivo arterio-venous shunt, we could show that TSR-410, but not Tirofiban, significantly inhibited thrombin-induced platelet adhesion and aggregation, as well as platelet-induced tissue factor release. Furthermore, TSR-410 significantly protected the endothelial integrity from thrombin-induced endothelial damage. In experimental carotid and wire-induced carotid injury, TSR-410 significantly reduced thrombus formation, whereas it did not have an effect on arterial wall lesion. TSR-410 was well tolerated, and no deaths, significant body weight changes, or obvious toxic effects were observed in a 15-week pharmacokinetic and toxicity study. TSR-410 potently inhibits platelet-tissue factor interaction and thrombin-induced blood vessel injury both in vitro and in vivo.Increased levels of matrix metalloproteinases-2 and-9 and decreased levels of tissue inhibitors of metalloproteinases-2 and -3 in serum of patients with Behcet's disease. Inflammation, particularly the innate immune response, contributes to the path lawyer Kerri Judd argues. After a 15-year post-secondary education, the CSP will offer parents the choice of a tax-free savings account, a registered retirement savings plan or a new, currently ill-defined minimum savings plan. But, Judd argues, the plan is structured in a way that fails to fulfill the government's own goal of "putting kids first." "If we do it as planned, there will be people saving for their child tax benefit cheque and saving for their Canada Savings Plan, but not saving because they don't want to put money into a registered retirement savings plan," says Judd, speaking at the Wealth Advisory in Toronto. �
