"Americanos" sounds like a simple, clear, and straight forward term, but it is much more complex. The term was coined by sociologist C. Wright Mills in 1952. Mills used the term to refer to the group of people in the United States whose national identity, culture and history were connected to the continent of America. Although Mills developed the idea of an American identity, he had no interest in "whiteness" as the single definitional marker of America. The term has been used to refer to peoples whose national identity, culture and history were connected to the continent of America. For example, Mexicans, Chinese, and Koreans are included in this category. But it is clear that the term is far more complex. The term “Americanos” can be used to refer to groups with a variety of definitions, some of which may have more affinity with Brazilians than with Americans. There is no single answer to the question, how should one understand the concept of “Americanos”? The first American Generation, also known as the Founding Generation of Americans, is associated with events that occurred in the United States during the late 18th and early 19th centuries. They were the first Americans to experience modernity as a connected to the transcontinental Atlantic Ocean. This meant that they were connected to the world with the creation and widespread acceptance of new ideas and institutions as well as having the significant influence of the activities of figures in the New World. It is a composite historical time that we can consider to be from the establishment of the United States and the end of the American Revolution (1783) to the ratification of the Constitution (1789), the promulgation of the first American Constitution (1787), the creation of the new American nation (1789), the establishment of the federal government and the war for independence (17 6d1f23a050
