A new report just released by the World Wildlife Fund reveals that certain species have been hit harder by climate change than we thought, and that we may have to adapt on a global scale to make sure our natural resources remain available for future generations to enjoy. But what do the numbers really tell us? Population Matters has put together an infographic showing how the proportion of species affected and impacted by climate change changes over time, and how things could change in the near future. We've got the facts and figures in a handy chart below, but first some background information on this issue. If you'll recall, back in 2012, a report from the United Nations Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (IPCC) put the estimated number of species that would go extinct by the end of this century at "between 10 and 100 percent." Previous estimates pegged the number closer to 1 to 2 percent. Some experts have disputed the IPCC's numbers. What's relevant to our infographic is that in April 2012, scientists from the Norwegian Centre for Environmental Research published a report on the whole planet stating that species on Earth are facing extinction at 1,000 times the rate they used to. "If we do nothing, the rate of extinction could soar to a level beyond our capacity to cope," the report said. The report goes on to say that climate change was one of the primary reasons for this rate of extinction. So what's changed between 2012 and now? First, we're facing an extinction rate faster than ever before. More than a third of all species have disappeared from the planet and around half of all the known species are in decline. But the speed of extinction also changes over time, and it becomes exponentially faster near the end of the 21st century, and some experts think we may be seeing it already. To understand why that is, you need to understand that the dominant trend in the first half of the 21st century is the warming of the climate. In addition to the warming of the climate, we've also been adding additional anthropogenic carbon dioxide to the atmosphere, which is itself a cause for concern because of the ensuing greenhouse effect. This, in turn, means that plants are able to absorb more of that carbon dioxide into their cells, and with that extra CO2, comes more water. This phenomenon, known as "plant transpiration," causes a rise in the global sea level
