"Just by adding a little bit of [electric] current, you can influence the amount of information that the brain has access to." Traces of brain activity were first recorded in the 19th century, and even in 1878, when French physiologist Paul Richer was trying to find the electrical causes of brain activity, he was not very successful. The first attempt to get a broader look at how the brain works used X-ray and positron emission tomography, which measures brain activity and can even predict future events, but the technique was cumbersome and, until now, cost prohibitive. But Dr. Rodebaugh and his colleagues, working with Dr. White, were able to use specially developed electrodes to track cells' electrical activity in the brain without having to damage them. They focused on cells called pyramidal cells, which are located on the surface of the brain and relay information up and down the brain's primary sensory and motor tracts. The researchers used a molecular technique called dynamic clamping to apply a voltage to the pyramidal cells and discovered that larger voltages change the brain's ability to process information. When the pyramidal cells were stimulated at slightly higher voltages, they could see improvements in the brain's ability to ignore background noise and focus on relevant data. In one trial, Dr. Rodebaugh's team was able to find that an increase in voltage resulted in the brain's ability to process signals from the fingers of the hand that was holding the device and ignore the electric interference from a common bathroom outlet. All of this was achieved without having to know a specific brain signal or address a particular cell, Dr. White said. The researchers were able to find that a range of voltages produced a range of outcomes and, therefore, determine how much of a stimulus they could deliver to a cell. Indeed, the researchers could not know how well a cell would work until after they had looked at the brain's electrical activity, Dr. White said. "The key is that if you go to what's called the microcircuit level to look at a specific cell, you don't
