Measurements of length, thickness and area of the triceps brachii muscle in the arm of 48 males and 48 females aged 20 to 40 years were made. The length and thickness of the muscle is significantly correlated with the index of arm circumference, whereas there is no relationship between the area of the muscle and the index of arm circumference. In both sexes, the triceps brachii muscle is shorter and thinner in subjects with increased body weight and body mass index than in those with normal weight. These findings suggest that abnormalities in the triceps brachii muscle in conditions of obesity may depend on the reduction of muscle length and thickness. Some objective criteria are available for the evaluation of fibrotic scleroderma. In recent years, the presence of systemic sclerosis (scleroderma) in healthy subjects has been increasingly diagnosed. If properly selected, objective criteria are available to diagnose scleroderma. The objective methods most frequently used in the diagnosis of the diffuse form of scleroderma (diastasis recti) were reviewed. An investigation of the possibility of radiological differentiation between the diffuse and limited forms of scleroderma revealed that the criteria for the normalization of the Doppler indices of the inferior vena cava can be used in the diagnosis of the limited form of scleroderma. The presence of internal carotid artery involvement in the diffuse form of s 6d1f23a050
